

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

The list of people who have assisted in the development of integrated marketing communication (IMC) over the past decade is too long to recount. Our knowledge and understanding of the principles of IMC have matured through their challenges, contributions, advocacy, and practices. The colleagues and associates we acknowledge here have helped shape not only this book but all our writing, research, and thinking on the subject.

First, we wish to thank our colleagues in the Integrated Marketing Communications Department at Northwestern University. A special thanks goes to our students—past and present—in the Master's Degree Program. Since the formation of the department in 1990, more than one thousand students have matriculated. They have contributed much to our own learning through their questions and classroom discussions, while at the same time developing their own perspectives on IMC. To those students and the dedicated faculty, our thanks and appreciation.

Our deep appreciation goes to a special faculty member, the late Stanley Tannenbaum, coauthor of the first book in this field, Integrated Marketing Communications. Stan influenced our thinking more than any other person. Thanks also to Dick Christian, former Associate Dean and the spiritual leader of IMC in its early days. Faculty members Ted Spiegel and Martin Block helped hone the concepts. Clarke Caywood and Paul Wang assisted in the initial research and thinking. Later, Frank Mulhern, Tom Collinger, Pat Whalen, and Ed Malthouse helped instill IMC concepts in our students. And while not on the Medill IMC faculty, Bob Lauterborn (University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill), also a coauthor of the original book, has successfully carried the IMC banner around the world.

Our special thanks also to Tom Duncan and Sandy Moriarty (University of Colorado, Boulder), two early believers and advocates of the IMC approach. Christian Gronroos (Hanken School of Economics, Helsinki), Adrian Payne (Cranfield Institute of Management, UK), Peter Reed (Monash University), and Chuck Patti (Queensland University of Technology) have added to our store of knowledge and our development of IMC concepts through their associations and affiliations.

Perhaps the greatest academic support has come from Professor Philip Kitchen (Hull University, UK), who has collaborated on a number of IMC research studies and articles and has coauthored two books using the IMC approach.

In addition, we would like to thank Philip Kotler (Kellogg School of Management, Northwestern University), who has supported the concept of IMC in his writings, seminars, and teaching. Given his stature, one cannot have a better advocate.

We have benefited immensely from our associations with business leaders around the world. Many have contributed substantially to the development of IMC or have furnished concepts that we have adapted and incorporated into our work. Chief among them are Jack Wolf, Jeff Walters, Dana Hayman, and Scott Bailey (Targetbase Marketing, Dallas); Clive Humby and colleagues (dunnhumby llp, London); David Haigh and his team (Brand Finance, plc., London); Peter Simon and John Pearce (Simon Richards Group, Melbourne, Australia); Kaj Storbacka (CRM Group, Helsinki); John Wallis (Hyatt International); and the talented and dedicated staff of the American Productivity and Quality Center in Houston.

Finally, we extend our thanks to all those who contributed to this manuscript. April Love (IMC Class of 2000) did the initial data gathering that contributed to the final text. A special class in the IMC Master's Program went through the manuscript chapter by chapter, critiquing, commenting, challenging, and sharpening the concepts that are articulated here. Tracy Roth (IMC Class of 2002) added much with her research skills and development of examples and illustrations. Kate Monte (Agora, Inc., Evanston, Illinois) did much to make sure the chapters were processed and reprocessed and then reprocessed again during the development days. And lastly, thanks to Anne Knudsen, our patient, dedicated editor, who brought clarity and focus to the manuscript. Her input was invaluable in helping us shape and polish the final product into what you see here.

None of the following would have been possible without this global team's support, suggestions, challenges, criticisms, and encouragement. It is the work of many. To all, our thanks and best wishes.
