Acknowledgments

When the time is right for an exploration of girls' sexuality or girls' aggression, an author is not alone. She works in a community of scholars, some of whom she knows, some of whom she doesn't, some whose work has gone unnoticed, and some whose work is more thorough or incisive than her own. I thank these scholars, poets, and authors.

I consider myself lucky to have found a home at Saint Michael's College, where faculty colleagues, staff, students, and the administration have supported my work in every way, through friendship, funding, warmth, reading of the manuscript, and their sensible spirituality. While many are mentioned below for specific help they gave, the community as a whole has my grateful thanks. There were several students who helped me in the beginning of this work: Kate Hanley, Jennifer Courtemanche, Jason Becker, Chrissie Venerus, Kate Colistra, and Heather Watters. I thank them and Herb Kessel, Kristin Novotny, Christina Walulik, Pauline Beaulieu, Meghan Carhart, Padraic Springuel, and Lizz Green, also at St. Mike's, for the practical assistance they gave. The Saint Michael's Faculty Development Committee as well as the Social Science Research Consortium helped support the cost of some travel and interviewing. Kristen Hinds, clever seeker of obscure references, made me feel as if I had access to my very own personal interlibrary loan shark. Vince Bolduc, Kyle Dodson, Bill Garrett, Adrie Kusserow, Sue Kuntz, Susan Ouellette, Trish Siplon, and Lorrie Smith read chapters or loaned crucial books. Buff Lindau's intelligent reading of the proposal helped shape the book itself.

The following friends and family outside of Saint Mike's helped through earlier work in this area, timely suggestions, loaning of books, or reading the manuscript at some point in the process: Diane Anstadt, Larry Blum, Lyn Mikel Brown, Peter Chubinsky, Mary Coakley, Crow Cohen, Bill Downs, Susan Edgar-Smith, Lisa Fontes, Janice Haaken, Gary Lamb, Leanne Leahy, Judith Levine, Shannon Longcore, Jeanne Marecek, Joanne McGee, Paul Okami, Doris Orgel, Shelley Orgel, Edie Raskin, and Sarah Sappington. Mary Theresa Struck and Jay Munane, amazing people, helped me to reach more African-American girls and women. Special thanks also to Laura Orgel, who interviewed some West Coast women for me as part of her doctoral work.

I am indebted to those friends and colleagues who went out of their way to help me find girls and women to interview: Andrew Garrod, Nona Lyons, Amy and Lois Bodnick, Joanne McGee, Bill and Nadine Downs, Rit Devenere, and Robin Koestner. Bill Puka's generosity, in particular, has overwhelmed me.

I also passionately thank my friend Bev Colston, because of her interviewing, her energy, her intelligence, the talks we had, the hugs, and her help in working through all the emotions associated with doing these interviews. She is a goddess.

Thanks to Doris Orgel and Judith Wallerstein for introducing me to my agent, Carol Mann. Thanks to my transcriber, Irma Gifford, whose competence and accuracy were phenomenal. Jennifer Kemp, with her baby name books, and Kathie Balutansky, with her collection of world literature, helped me find aliases for the 122 women interviewed. Sometimes I also borrowed the names of people I knew, and hope that no one will think the stories here actually are stories of these friends and neighbors. I am also grateful for Nancy Keyes, who approved of the wild girl, and Barbara Torpie, who helped to civilize her.

Rachel Hare-Mustin, Jerome Kagan, Catherine Snow, and Carol Gilligan at Harvard Graduate School of Education have been major influences. And I am thankful for those phone and e-mail conversations with friends that keep me on track and intellectually alive—Larry Blum, Judith Levine, Jeffrie Murphy, and Janice Haaken, as well as for my connections with the good people at the Association for Moral Education. Conversations with Jan Haaken and Judith Levine always helped me to clarify my thinking, and I am especially indebted to Jan for her thoughts on lower-class girls and their lack of a "protected space," as well as Shelley Orgel for his thoughts on women's aggression and creativity.

Carol Mann, my agent and wise woman, helped shape the book early on by asking important questions and sending me away to rewrite. My editor, Philip Rappaport, had tremendous enthusiasm for "girl books" and was keenly aware of the moral dimension of this work. Beth Haymaker, who also edited the book, became for me the epitome of that smart, enthusiastic, and totally engaged reader every author dreams of.

While I wrote this book, my all-male family went on and lived their lives, unconcerned with the secrets this girl kept. They loved me and put up with my moodiness and deserve thanks for that. Memories of my parents, Martha and Tracy Lamb, their encouragement, generosity, and my dad's love of "Oprah" were always with me.

The women and girls I interviewed are to be thanked and thanked again. I appreciate wholeheartedly their willingness to share what secrets they could and understand what secrets they maybe couldn't.
