

CONTEMPORARY SOCIAL POLICY IN THE EUROPEAN UNION

Aims

An examination and analysis of the 'European' characterisation, and context, of the development of European Union social policy, leading to assessment of the degree of Europeanisation of European Union social policy.

Objectives

Initially, the historical development of European Union social policy will be examined within the context of the growth in importance of social policy areas in the E.U. integration project. Against that background the course will move on to identify and characterise models of welfare in European states, as well as four typologies of European welfare states. The principles and concepts of harmonisation, mutual recognition, and convergence which shape and condition E.U. social policy will then be defined and examined. Finally, definition and assessment of the degree of general Europeanisation of social policy will be undertaken within the context of the previous aspects and elements of the course, and in particular in terms of comparison with the characteristics of the types of European welfare states identified in the course.

Structure of the course

The course will be taught through a series of 5 lectures and 1 workshop.

Books

Hantrais provides a useful introductory overview, and is useful for a range of E.U. social policy areas covered in the course. Kleinman addresses some broader issues concerning the role of social policy in the E.U. Kleinman (Ch.7) also examines the pressures created for EU social policy by rising levels of unemployment and changes in Labour Market policies. Richardson (Ch.3) examines 'Europeanisation' and the E.U. social policy process (Ch.13). Featherstone and Radaelli also examine 'Europeanisation'.
