Furies seem threatening: suddenly loud dynamics, tremolos in the strings, chromatic motion, dissonant chords (including diminished seventh chords at the ends of phrases, as at measure 90), and blasts from the brass (as at measures 116–17). Unlike the divertissements of Lully's operas, in which dance and choral music were used for decoration, this scene features a ballet and chorus that are integrated with the central action of the drama.

Cluck prided himself on the simplicity of his melodies, sparseness of embellishment, and economy of melodic and text repetition, all of which are illustrated in Orfeo's song to the Furies. His song proceeds in the balanced two- and four-measure phrases of the contemporary Italian style, but with a more limited range and with very simple melodic ornamentation—mostly sighing appoggiaturas—that would not have offended French tastes. Characteristic of Cluck, this scene combines Italian style with French elements, including the chorus (marked "coro" in the score), dances (marked "ballo"), and evocative use of instrumental timbre.

The role of Orfeo was written for a castrato, as was typical of heroic male roles in Italian operas of the eighteenth century. In Cluck's later French adaptation of the opera for performance in Paris, Orfeo (now Orphée) was recast as a tenor because castrati were not in fashion on the French stage. Since the modern revival of historical performance practice has not extended to the creation of castratos, the part of Orfeo is now normally sung by either by a male countertenor or a female mezzo-soprano. As was typical in Gluck's time, the countertenor on the recording accompanying this anthology adds some improvised embellishment to the melody, especially in the final phrase.
