

Narrative Essay

- Storytelling is a part of human nature, the purpose is a sharing the knowledge and wisdom of people
- intended audience – anyone who wants to listen
- it's a short story of related events in a logical sequence
- I chose this essay because I find the most natural and the most pleasant to write for me.

Descriptive Essay

- the goal is to describe objects, things, places, experiences, persons, and situations – to this it is used sensory information of the five senses, readers should feel, smell, see, taste, or hear what is described
- it is necessary to describe things precisely
- imagery is used to make things seem real and remarkable for the reader
- I chose this type of essay because I found interesting the way it is trying to convey the feeling and perception of things to others.

Analytical Essay

- its primary goal is to explain something bit by bit to enhance understanding
- an analytical essay analyzes a piece of literature from different angles
- I chose this essay because I study psychology and I like to read psychoanalytic interpretations of fairy tales or other literary works. So this kind of essay sounded like something similar to me. But I am not sure I am right.

In my previous work I chose these 5 genres or sub-genres: fantasy, fairy tales, fiction, autobiographies and parodies.

I think that narrative essay could fall under all these types. Descriptive essay could also be a part of these genres (but it does not fulfill them in their entirety). Analytical essay is a so specific and it is rather a new interpretation of a previously written narrative so I think this type of essay doesn't belong to these genres. The last years I have been writing only school assignment, so I would like to try to write something that I will enjoy more, something more creative.....but it would be probably challenging because it is completely different from I'm used to write.
