First of all following sentences and senses they bear, I'd love to say hello to the reader of this modest text. Further I'm going to share something personal with you. To start with, writing has always been a part of my scholar presence which still follows me in my university life. If we attempt to count and put all my written works into categories, the prevailed ones will be "essays" and "absence excuses".

None of them I enjoy much because they concern school. Trying to explain someone's ideas has never been my passion or ideal concept of creative writing.

However (and this however doesn't aim to highlight the academic style of this non-academic masterpiece), the school assignments left a negative impression on writing. Although, I enjoyed doing writing with my English tutor who encouraged my will to express radical thoughts on the paper.

But the flow of thoughts proceeded through the writing remains captivating. When I put a certain time and effort to it I can say that I proud of the result. To be honest, It has never been a big deal for me to come up with an essay. In the childhood I even challenged myself to write a biiiig novel (which I haven't finished though). Since that times, I've been trying to control this flow but a bit unsuccessfully what makes it a slightly hard to share with others.

No, I'm not ashamed of my writing, just usually people don't get the point.

Aspiration to the perfectionism contributes much to the deal of sharing: I always find a room for improvement and corrections.

Speaking about creative writing, I'd say that if an author uses their imagination (at least to compound the text), this text can be called creative. Creativity is not only about sensation but also about the harmony and logic. Without them the perception wouldn't be an easy part.

Normally, I read fantasy and sci-fi literature. They give me both profound ideas and fresh perspective on imaginary stuff. Besides, it's a good entertainment.

I mostly desire what is hard to achieve, I mostly desire rest and optional reading. Am I doing my best to get it? Probably, the answer is NO. See, tonight I'm pretty outspoken.

The tenth question made me feel perplexed. What language do I use? It depends. Perfectly, I present the "treasures" of my vocabulary, but normally come up with new memes in messenger.

Okay, here is the last question. I should think deeply and express my thoughts in explicit and easy way. I feel that the whole text above was meant to end up with this final term. Let's go.

ESSAY- a written expression of one's beliefs and thoughts, normally profound but more luckily a tricky one. As you can see from the aforementioned.
