

My work is supposed to show the story of city that had to be demolished because of the decision of government. The city I'm going to write about is inspired by my very own city where I was born (Most, situated at the north of Czech Republic, famous for coal production and one of the highest rates of unemployment in the country).

This is a fiction short story showing how tragic can be lives of people who will soon lose their homes and what actually happened to the whole city in the past. It's dedicated especially to people who did live in this city or are living in conditions similar to this.

The purpose of this writing is to share a story that happened in my city but is also now happening in Kiruna, Sweden.

I want to improve my narrative writing and the vocabulary that comes hand in hand with it. Also just to get a grip in writing so I can write better and less painful-to-read texts. And maybe one day write something worth publishing.

It's really hard to say what do I take inspiration from. But if I had to choose then I would say Neil Gaiman, from whom I've read two books and loved both of them so much (Norse mythology and Neverwhere), and the Harry Potter series from J.K. Rowling (a bit of cliché I know). What I love about Gaiman's style of writing is that after just a few sentences you desire to know what comes next. He is great at describing the scenarios which makes his story so thrilling. And what I like about J.K. Rowling's writing is the development of the story and the way how is everything coming together. She does an amazing job with foreshadowing the situations.
